Women and men who are diagnosed with prostate cancer in the United States experience similar clinical outcomes. Despite this similarity, recent research has identified an increasing incidence of prostate cancer among African-American men. Recent estimates suggest that African-American men have a 70% higher incidence of prostate cancer compared to white men. This trend may be attributed, in part, to environmental factors affecting African-American men. Higher rates of prostate cancer development have been observed in urban areas of the southeastern U.S. compared to the Midwest. This trend may be attributed, in part, to increased residential or occupational exposures to endocrine-disrupting compounds, such as polybrominated diphenyl ethers (PBDEs), which are known to alter sexual hormone levels in the body. The mechanisms of action of PBDEs, however, are not well understood.

Thus, while PBDE exposure has been suggested as a possible cause of increased incidence of prostate cancer in African-American men, there are little data to support this hypothesis. We propose to examine the relationship between residential PBDE exposures and the development of prostate cancer among African-American men living in the southeastern U.S. Using archived PBDE and prostate cancer data from an ongoing cohort study, the Prostate Cancer and the Environment (PRCE) study, we propose to conduct three years of intensive epidemiologic, environmental, and molecular analysis. Our specific aims are to: 1) to assess residential exposure to PBDEs and to determine their association with the development of prostate cancer; 2) to determine whether PBDE exposure is associated with molecular markers of prostate cancer development; and 3) to determine whether PBDE exposure modifies the association between selected environmental exposures and the development of prostate cancer. In addition to the epidemiologic and molecular analyses, our cohort will receive detailed disease and tumor data on each study subject, including tumor characteristics and chemotherapy use. The proposed research will
